Introduction

It all starts when an actor, Yasuo Daichi visited a little town called Kembuchi in 2007. Kembuchi has been trying to revitalise the town by children's "picture book". The local people have always tried to find some time to use the means of story-telling as part of their education. They've been working on this project over 20 years and it has been creating and spreading sense of community amongst the town.

He was moved by how much the locals are genuinely connected and care about each other, just like how we all used to be. He saw kids with sparkles in their eyes and the bright future of families in the town on that day. After visiting the town, he decided to make a movie themed at the family bonds and that is "Jin Jin".

Story

Ginzaburo, a traditional Japanese style street performer, has a daughter. She once used to ask him about to tell the stories every night. But this time has completely stopped since he got divorced. The only thing he can remember about her is when she was 6 years old.

He visits the farm run by his old friend in his hometown, which he does every single year. However, he wasn't the only one to stay in the farm this year.

Four teenage girls are there to experience the work and life of the countryside. The girls find it difficult to get on with Ginzaburo for the first couple of days. But the great nature they are surrounded by and the experiences they gain together helped them to understand and accept each other day by day. However, one of the girls, Ayaka was an exception. One day, Ginzaburo was told a secret about her...

"Jin Jin" is a Japanese word that expresses the emotional feeling of something that moves you deep down in your heart.
